GRANT AND CONKLING.

The Hero of Appomattox Gives His Reasons for Being a Republican.

In His Characteristic, Clear-cut, Terse, Forceful and Comprehensive Phrase.

They Are a Masterly Summary of the Facts of the Political Situation.

The Great New York Senator Surpasses All His Former Efforts.

One of the greatest Republican demonstrations of the campaign was that at Warren, Ohio, on the 28th ult., at which Gen. Grant presided, and speeches were delivered by Messrs. Grant, Conkling and Logan. Between 25,000 and 30,000 people were in attendance, and the enthusiasm was unbounded.

Gen. Grant's Address.

LADIES AND GENTLEMEN: I hope we may be able to have quiet and order here. It is not important, so far as anything that I will have to say to you is concerned, because I shall not be able to make many of you hear; but after me comes a speaker whom I know you will all be glad to hear, and you can do so by keeping quiet and orderly. Not being accustomed to speaking publicly, I have drawn off the few words that I will say in advance of the gentleman who is to follow me. [Taking a roll of manuscript from his pocket, the General read.]

In view of the well-known character and ability of the speaker who is to address you today, and his long public career and association with the leading statesmen of the country for the past twenty years, it would not be becoming in me to detain you with many remarks of my own. But it may be proper for me to allude to you, on the first occasion of my presiding at a political meeting, for the "faith that is in me" is a Republican, as are the two great political parties now divided. Because the Republican party is a national party seeking the greatest good of the greatest number of its citizens. There is not a precinct in this vast nation where a Democrat cannot cast his ballot, and have it counted as cast, no matter what the predominance of the opposite party. He can procure a thousand votes without fear and without reproach. There are fourteen States, and localities in some others, where Republicans have not that privilege. This is one reason why I am a Republican, but I am a Republican for many other reasons.

The Republican party assures protection to life, property, public credit, and the payment of the debt of the Government. State, county or municipality, so far as it can control.

The Democratic party does not promise this. If it does, it has broken its promise to the extent of hundreds of millions, as many Northern Democrats can testify to their sorrow.

I am a Republican as between existing parties, because it fosters the production of the field and farm, and of manufactures, and it encourages general education of the poor as well as the rich.

The Democratic party discourages all these when in absolute power.

[The Republican party is a party of progress and of liberality toward its opponents. It encourages the poor to strive to better their condition, the ignorant to educate their children, to enable them to compete more successfully with their more fortunate associates, and, in time, it secures an entire equality before the law of every citizen, no matter what his race, nationality, or previous condition. It tolerates no privileged class of men. Every one has the opportunity to make himself all that he is capable of. Winding through the forest,
Gilding o'er the plain,
Sparkling in the sunshine,
Laughing in the rain,
Through the busy city,
Through the fields of corn,
Runs a rippling river,
Beautiful as morn,
Patient in its mission,
Lonely through the course,
Bearing in its bosom
Love's heroic force,
All subdued and gentle,
Overcoming strife,
For the lives of others,
Spending all its life.
As I stand beside it
Come a thought of one
(Falls a tear—oh, what it
Patient as the sun
Was he ever bearing
Sorrow silently?
All our pious prayers,
With a child's gladness,
Cheerful as a sunbeam,
Tender, true and brave;
And a faint smile
Shines around his grave.
If no revelation
Whispered from the sod
But that from beneath it,
I should tread a god,
If no light appeared
To my soul's eternal
Home, were I not
Worth but enough of heaven.

MEXICO, IND.

COUSIN EDWARD.

How He Learned His Lesson.

CHAPTER I.

"Oh, what have I done! What have I done!" exclaimed Nellie, under her breath, as sad and dismayed she hurried up the garden path. "He will never be kind to me any more. How could I have said such things!" And her hands trembled so that she could scarcely lift the latch of the old-fashioned door, and she turned away to quiet herself a little before going in.

The garden was lovely and luxuriant, and heavy dews, weighing down the heads of all the beautiful blossoms, made it still more lovely in the calm, clear light of the moon which shone so brightly overhead. But with a sigh Nellie crept out of the glory of silver light, and paced to and fro beneath a row of rugged elms, whose far-spreading branches cast a network of shadow over the flowery borders and neatly-graveled paths below.

Nellie glanced up at the rambling old farm-house, which had been her home for so many years. How she loved it! Every nook and corner that it contained was dear to her.

"I have it and all in it left to me," she said, in a soft, sad tone, "and dear father and mother, too. A happy, happy home it has always been, and I am thankful for it! But, oh, Edward! how could you be so unkind? Oh! how could you?"

She listened, fancying she could hear his departing footsteps yet. And perhaps she might have done so.

With lofty looks and disdainful curve of his rather-thin lips, he was on his way home, along the winding lanes. He was a man of five-and-thirty, while Nellie was scarcely 20. She was simple and innocent as a child, but he had learned many a lesson in the school of life ere this. Yet another was in store for him, and probably another and another, for while we live we must learn; and we will learn—so foolish are we—in the most costly and laborious way, for the most part. "Experience keeps a dear school," says the proverb, "but fools will go to no other." And are we not all fools until hard and inexorable experience has knocked and kneaded wisdom into us? And one lesson which Edward Melville prized himself on having learned was the value of money. He was a bachelor, and so he made up his mind he would remain until he could find a woman with money who would be his wife. He himself was a country doctor, and, with a very small and not increasing practice, it would never do to marry and have but that to depend upon, he told himself.

He had generally escorted Nellie to her own door, after their evening walks, but this evening he had left her just outside the gate. He was her aunt's step-son. She had known him all her young life, and had always called him Cousin Edward, all unsuspecting of the feeling which was steadily gaining strength within her heart, till this evening. And Edward, for his part, had always treated her as a mere child.

"A glorious night!" he murmured, as he leisurely pursued his way; and as he looked round at the elms and trees and wayside brook, and picturesque farm-houses dotted here and there, all sleeping in the moonlight, the disdainful curve left his lips, and pride and haughty smothered themselves away from his brow.

"Poor little Nellie!" he said, again, with something like a repentant smile. "I suppose, then, that she cares a little more for me than I deserve. It is a great bore, for of course it is out of the question that I should—that I could."

He paused, and began humming a tune, and switching the dew-laden hedges with his walking-stick.

"No," he presently recommenced, "one must have enough to be comfortable. And Nellie has got nothing, and I have got next to nothing. One may put up with the want of a little sentiment, I should imagine, if one has a tolerable settlement in life. At all events, I mean to try it."

CHAPTER II.

"You will go to meet Miss Bassett, I suppose, Nellie?" inquired her mother. "Oh, yes, mother. Edward was good enough to say that he would drive me to the station in his dog cart, too. He says that a rich young lady like Miss Bassett will not care to walk a mile, even along our lovely lanes, he is sure."

Perhaps there was the slightest undertone of sarcasm in Nellie's voice, for mother glanced at her as if in surprise, without replying.

Edward had given Nellie, bit by bit, and with a good deal of tact, his ideas upon the subject of money, and of the comfort to be derived from a proper use of it. Outwardly the two were as good friends as ever. At heart, however, he was carefully on his guard, while Nellie, tender and good-natured, though she was, could not help slightly despising him.

Miss Bassett was an old schoolfellow of Nellie's, and a great heiress, and she had taken a fancy to spend the remainder of the summer in the old tumble-down farm-house which Nellie called home.

Edward was very attentive, even specially kind to Nellie, on their way to the station, and her heart went out to him again. "If only I had not said that to him," she thought, as the dog-cart stopped and he carefully lifted her out. "I hope—O, I do hope that he may forget it."

The train ran in. There was pretty Grace Bassett's face at a first-class carriage window, and in a few minutes she was seated in the dog-cart beside Edward, chatting to and laughing with him as if she had known him for years; and Nellie had taken the seat behind. And that was not the only drive they had, nor the only evening they spent in chatting and laughing. Nellie and her father and mother—all three, and many of the neighbors besides, soon saw what it would come to. And Nellie grew older and graver day by day. But as yet she kept her own secret, and she hoped more and more that Edward had forgotten her foolish, thoughtless words on a certain moonlight night, now some seven or eight weeks ago.

At last the engagement was announced. Grace Bassett had no friends to interfere with her, and, flattered by Edward's attentions, and quite believing that she loved him "quite enough for happiness," she had agreed that the marriage should take place as soon as all needful arrangements could be made.

"You know, Nellie," said she, as the two sat sewing in the garden one hot afternoon, while Edward was out on his rounds, "it really does not do to love a person too much. You are certain to become a slave to his whims and caprices if you do. I have always made up my mind that I would marry a man who loved me, and that if I had a reasonable liking for him in return he would not expect or even wish anything more."

Nellie made some reply, she scarcely knew what, and then she went on thinking the matter over. Had she been exalting love to an undue value? With her it had stood before everything. "If a man would give all the substance of his house for love it would utterly be condemned." She had entirely indorsed the sentiment. But now was it possible that she had made a mistake? Grace Bassett was a year or two older than herself, and probably knew better than she did. Nevertheless, at the conclusion of her cogitations, Nellie shook her head, and half smiled and half sighed as she answered:

"Well, you have, of course, a right to your own opinion, Grace, but I must say I don't agree with you. I think that I would rather die than marry a man whom I did not love with all my heart."

And Nellie gathered up her sewing and went into the house, singing as she went:

Love shall still be lord of all.

CHAPTER III.

The wedding was over. The honeymoon was over also, and Mrs. Melville, richly dressed, and looking very lovely, with Edward as an attentive and devoted husband beside her, was receiving her guests.

Nellie was among them. She was paler than usual, and her free, happy, girlish laugh was gone forever. Yet she, too, looked lovely this afternoon, in her pretty blue silk dress and cottage bonnet, and there was a sweetness and beauty in the expression of her gentle young face that went far beyond any mere beauty of feature.

The house was handsome and well-appointed, the servants were models of attentive respect. All seemed as it should be. Nellie stayed the remainder of the day, and saw nothing that she did not like. Edward was forever on the watch to please Grace, and she, for her part, took it all as her due, and so far gave him her sweetest smiles in return. What more could be wanted?

Only a few weeks passed. Nellie was invited to dine with them. After dinner they were moving about the drawing-room, and Grace was exhibiting to Nellie some choice bouquets of flowers which had been sent her that morning. They had all been arranged on one table, in accordance with a whim of the young wife, who declared that the effect of their richness and color was lost when they were scattered.

But Edward had not heard her say this.

"Let me put this blue vase here, Grace," he unwittingly began, removing it, as he spoke, to another table.

"There! It shows to advantage now!"

Grace, with heightened color, deliberately walked to the table, and, taking up the vase, restored it to its former position.

"It is quite out of the way there," she said, stiffly, "and this is where I wish it to be, Edward."

"How great a matter a little fire kindleth!" Edward's color also rose, yet he did not look angry.

"And I wish that it should stand here," he returned, once more taking up the vase, and then he added, half reproachfully, half playfully, "you promised to obey me, Grace; did you not?"

"Don't be so ridiculous, Edward!" And her eyes flashed, and she looked as if she would have dashed the flowers from his hand, and before he could set them down she had taken them from him, and finally placed them in the particular spot she had chosen.

Edward looked pained, and Nellie mused wonderingly over it all, as he, in moody silence, escorted her home. Could all this have happened in a house where love was lord? No, indeed. "A woman," thought Nellie, "who loves, loves also to obey."

But this proved to be only the beginning of small discomforts and disagreements. Many months passed. Grace grew more imperious than ever, and Edward's face lost all its brightness, and he seemed day by day to grow old and silent and sad. And when Nellie went to see them now, she found that unless Grace expected visitors she took but small pains with herself, remarking sometimes to Nellie, as they went downstairs for the evening:

"I have not dressed, Nellie. Of course you don't mind, and there's nobody else but Edward."

Nobody but Edward! Love would have made him all the world to Nellie.

I would wear my prettiest and best dresses for my husband, Grace," she said. "As for other people, they might go. What should I care for them?"

But Grace only frowned for reply.

Nellie had not been to see them for some time, and various small circumstances caused her to suspect that they had had a serious quarrel. Grace had gone for a fortnight—all alone—and Nellie's father, taking pity upon solitary, sorrowful-looking Edward, had invited him to spend an evening with them.

After tea he sauntered into the garden, and he was gone so long that Nellie went to look for him. She glanced under the shady trees—it was summer again now—but he was not to be seen. Then she came to the summer-house. Ah, there he was, leaning forward on the little green-painted table, his head in his hands, and Nellie heard him murmur, in a low, moaning tone:

"I wish, oh! I wish—"

The rest was indistinct, and his long, lingering, whatever it might be, was still his own secret. And Nellie passed softly on and indoors.

Grace had a little daughter, but, instead of rejoicing in Edward's house, there was bitter sorrow, and as the young husband knelt by the bedside of his unconscious wife, he felt all the old love for her filling his heart once more.

But what will even the tenderest love avail in hours like these? Grace's last moments were numbered, and she passed away, leaving her little one to Nellie.

And Edward, when the first benumbing influence of his grief was over, sold his practice—he had no need of it now—and went abroad.

Eighteen months passed away. A man bronzed and bearded stood at the gate of the old farm-house. A little toddling creature ran down the path, her fair curls flying in the wind. The stranger caught her up.

"What is your name, little one?"

"And in baby-voice she told him 'Gracie Melville,' and he covered her little face and hair with kisses. But who was this coming out to look for her?"

"Auntie Nellie!" she said, in pretty piping treble, and slid down from her father's arms.

"Cousin Edward!" exclaimed Nellie, gladly, the color rising rapidly to her usually quiet, pale face.

And he shook hands with her; then, keeping the hand he had taken, he led her indoors.

"And will you tell me now, once more, Nellie, dearest, that you love me better than any one else in the world?"

Nellie swiftly covered his mouth with her hand, while burning blushes dyed her cheeks.

"Oh, Cousin Edward, do please forget that I ever said so!"

"Not likely," he returned, smilingly. "Ah, Nellie," and he was serious now. "I have learned my lesson since that evening. I have learned to value love, not as it deserves, but at least to set it above everything earthly. My Nellie! do not tell me that your love for me is dead!"

Never mind Nellie's reply. Two months from that day she became Edward's wife, and he never had the smallest need to remind her that she had promised to obey him, simply because she loved him, and to do as he wished was a pleasure.

And, having at great risk and cost learned his lesson, Edward strove to teach it to others, and to more than one young man he gave in confidence the advice: "If you wish to be happy, marry only a woman who loves you. Neither money nor position, nor anything else, can bear the least comparison with love, which will outlive them all."

To Encourage Agriculture.

The Lima-Kila Club Committee on Agriculture reported that all space wanted by the club at the State fair could be secured, and recommended that the members bestir themselves on the matter of entries. After considerable discussion it was resolved to offer premiums as follows in the name of the club:

1. For the largest watermelon grown in a cornfield eighty rods from a house, a prize of a wheelbarrow with red handles. Exhibitors must make affidavit that they did not set a watch on the melon-patch. In case no colored man lived within two miles of the cornfield, the exhibit will not count.

2. For the biggest possum grown in the State, a prize of 50 cents in cash.

3. For the best lot of ten dogs owned by any one colored family in the State, a prize of a grindstone making forty-four revolutions per minute.

4. For a dozen vases which have roosted each night for six months in a hen-coop not guarded by a bear-trap, alarm-bell, spring-gun or other device to prevent a full and fair investigation of their manner of roosting, a prize of a photograph of an ice-house containing fifty tons of ice.

Later on several other premiums will probably be offered, and the club intends to offer a prize for the best specimen of freestone on a board fence with a whitewash brush, competition open to the world.—Detroit Free Press.

The Northwestern Lumberman mentions an experiment which may have important results for lumbermen and grist-millers. Sawdust and bran compressed at little cost into a space which will much reduce the cost of their transportation. Into a block of compressed sawdust an eight-penny nail was driven so firmly that it broke in the attempt to draw it. Yet the block was easily friable. Three pecks of bran were compressed into a roll six inches long by six inches diameter, capable of enduring much handling, yet easily broken by the fingers. The process will probably bring sawdust largely into use for bedding horses, and will reduce the cost of bran to consumers distant from the mills.

A Penitent Dog.

Dog stories have been so common and so marvelous as to obtain little more credence than "fish stories," but the following is so well vouched for as to leave no possible doubt of its truth. A lady in Lowell owns a very intelligent dog, of which she desired much to have a picture. She accordingly took him to a photographic gallery, and with the assistance of the artist endeavored to make her pet take and keep a suitable position before the camera. But the spoiled dog was in an unaccommodating mood that morning, and after repeated trials, the attempt to conquer him was abandoned in despair. "Go home," the lady said, at last, pointing to the door. "You are a bad, naughty, naughty dog," the culprit changed instantly his saucy manner, and, dropping his tail between his legs, slunk away in confusion. All the rest of the day he seemed to realize that he was in disgrace, crouching in corners and wearing a shamefaced air. The next morning he was missing, and all search failed to discover him. About noon he reappeared, much elated, and, having fastened to his neck an excellent tin-type of himself. Inquiry disclosed the fact that when the photographer went down town in the morning the intelligent dog had been at the door of the gallery awaiting admission. As soon as the door was opened Carlo ran joyously up stairs and leaped into the chair on which his mistress had posed him the day previous. Seizing the situation, the artist made his preparations with all possible speed, and the result was the delightful picture which the four-footed penitent had taken home, as a peace-offering to his mistress.

"The Ladies Co-operative Dress Association of New York."

Some of our readers may have heard of the project indicated by the above title, and would like to hear more of it.

Soon after the matter was first broached it became one of the chief topics of interest among hundreds of New York ladies. A surprising number of ladies of wealth as well as of moderate means, expressed their desire to join. A dozen ladies met to talk the matter over more formally. At this time the matter had awakened more interest than the ladies concerned had imagined. Published statements had spread the news of it. Letters poured into the homes of the ladies hundreds at a time, and much confidence was felt in the success of the scheme. The ladies interested, who had said that they would be glad to come forward and give their money, generally understood that it was a purely philanthropic undertaking.

The chief object of the scheme here, as generally understood by many, was to reduce the price of dress-making, millinery, and children's apparel. It was not the general opinion that the cost of dress fabrics in the stores could be much decreased, but it is believed that dress fabrics could certainly be sold at nearly cost price. The milliners and dressmakers have prices in their own hands to-day.

The meeting at which the project of organizing was formally announced was an affair of larger dimensions than was expected. The thirty ladies who were expected to attend increased to two hundred, to say nothing of the undertaking gave rise to timidity, and when the plan of organization was divulged by Miss Kate Field one hundred and sixty of the ladies decided to retire. Miss Field had selected the trustees of the institution, and they were to be the founders. These gentlemen included some of New York's most prominent citizens. A stock broker, already appointed, was to take charge of the business details according to this plan, and it was proposed that the ladies present should buy the stock and become members of the association. The capital stock was to be $225,000. Twelve per centum on the capital stock for the first year would defray the running expenses, and a small percentage of profit would fall into the hands of the first stock buyers. The capital stock was to be doubled the second year.

Two Brave Girls.

Miss Rebecca W. Bates, of Scituate Harbor, one of the heroines of 1812, has just celebrated her 87th anniversary at the old homestead. Two sisters, Rebecca and Abigail, daughters of the lighthouse-keeper at Scituate, played a part in the Revolutionary period as noteworthy as Barbara Fréiche. The lighthouse at the above period was made the scene of a five-and-a-half-day battle between the British and the Americans. Two American vessels were coming into the harbor laden with flour. As it was shallow, the men-of-war were afraid to venture, and manned two boats to pursue them. They were fast gaining on them when seen by Rebecca and Abbie Bates, when going out to pick up chips to boil the tea-kettle for the evening meal. The place was under the protection of "Home guards," who, not apprehending any danger, were on a forage in a buckelberry patch. The girls had become familiar with ammunition and military music. Perceiving the danger, one of the sisters proposed to face the enemy with guns, but, quickly taking in the fearful odds, had recourse to a stratagem. They fled to a side of the lighthouse, so as to be concealed from the enemy, and one of them in stentorian tones called the roll. In an instant after Rebecca struck a martial air on the fife, and Abbie hammered on the drum lustily. The music reached the British, a flag was hoisted, and the two boats wheeled about, and in the act a scaman fell overboard, but was seized, neck and heels, and hauled in. The music also alarmed the absent guards, who returned in time to raise tumultuous cheers as the enemy were departing, the ladies playing "Yankee Doodle." These two sisters never married, although they had several proposals.

They were very industrious and could ply the needle and thread on any kind of garment, for male or female. The family is remarkable for their longevity. Their father died when very aged, and their mother at 87, and their paternal grandfather at more than 100. One sister, Mrs. Jane Curtis, is in her 90th year, and another, Mrs. Hawthorne, is in her 79th. The house occupied by these two celebrities was built by their grandfather 140 years ago, and is in a wonderful state of preservation.—Boston Traveller.

The Small Days of Chicago.

New York and Boston, about 250 years old, have respectively 1,000,000 and 350,000 inhabitants. Chicago made up her half million in little over forty years. In New York and Boston one sees the graves of eight generations, and the relics of colonial times. In Chicago Mr. Gordon S. Hubbard is now living, an active man, 78 years of age (and looking 60), who came to the spot when there were but two houses there.

The site of this great city, a favorite one with the Indians, was early visited by some of those splendid old "pioneers of France in the New World," who have been made famous in this generation by the pen of that accomplished and genial historian, Mr. Parkman. Old Pere Marquette was there in 1673, and returned in the winter of 1674-75. It was also known to Joliet (for whom a town not far off is now named), Hennepin, and La Salle. The name is of Indian origin, chebecagua meaning "strong," and being also the term for a kind of wild onion found on the shore of the lake in old days. The place is first known to geography as the "Fort Chebecagua" of a French map published toward the end of the seventeenth century. Fort Dearborn was built by our Government in 1804, and the late John H. Kinzie, an eminent pioneer and citizen of Chicago, celebrated the first anniversary of his birthday on its site, his father having arrived three days before, in company with Maj. Whistler and his command. The Fort Dearborn massacre, perpetrated by the Indians, was in 1812, and the bones of the soldiers were lying buried near the shore when young Kinzie returned from Detroit in 1816.—Harper's Magazine.

Hints to the Consumptive.

The diet of the consumptive should be simple and nutritious; very strict rules as to special articles of diet are uncalled for, unless the stomach should have exhibited unusual signs of imperfect power. Meat should be taken once or twice a day, with a good allowance of fat. Fish is nutritious, especially oysters. Milk is very nutritious, and two or three pints may be taken in the course of the day. At the Hospital for Consumption at Brompton many of the patients have a glass of rum and milk the first thing in the morning, before breakfast, to help them to dress, and undoubtedly it often does good. Asses' milk may be taken when ordinary milk disagrees. Another favorite prescription is fat bacon for breakfast. Sugar is very fattening, and there is no objection to taking it even in considerable quantities. A moderate allowance of wine or spirits is advisable, but it should be taken with caution when it flushes the face or quickens the pulse. Moderate and frequent exercise in the open air is essential. We do know that now and again it is very essential to "change the air," but we consider that to do that with any chance of advantage it is necessary to go far afield; and we think also that such change of the air is only needful when sickness of the body has come upon us, or when it threatens to come. When nothing else can be done, sitting out in the open air should always be insisted on—in a garden, on a balcony, or even at an open window. Anything is better than remaining shut up in the same room from morning to night. We heard of a man who, on being told that riding was beneficial, hired a horse and galloped about till he was so exhausted that he did not recover for a fortnight. Exercise should be carried to a point short of producing fatigue. In ordinary cases of consumption there is not the slightest occasion for the patient to keep his room, but still it is very important that the sleeping apartment should be properly ventilated. The great thing is to get as much pure air as possible consistent with warmth and the absence of draughts. Only a moderate temperature should be permitted, so that when in bed the patient does not feel cold. In summer, good ventilation should be secured by letting down the windows for an inch or so at the top. At the Hospital for Consumption at Brompton the wards and galleries are kept, winter and summer, at a uniform temperature of a little over 60 deg. The policy of this system is open to question, and, in the opinion of many competent judges, the patients would do better if the temperature were considerably reduced.—Family Physician.

A Miner's Secret.

Denver Republican.

A number of old residents of Denver remember a venerable Scotch mountaineer by the name of McDonald, who came to the city three or four times during the war with a small donkey, carrying his rifle and several buckskin bags well filled with gold dust. On such occasions he would deposit in some of the banks not less than from $15,000 to $18,000. McDonald was a very social and talkative old fellow, but never would reveal where he got his gold. Several men undertook to follow him secretly to learn where he was going, but all came back without knowing any more than when they started, for McDonald each time contrived to throw them off the trail, and the men reported that they invariably lost all traces of him near the White River, after following him through the Ute Pass as far as the Middle Park.

Whenever McDonald came to Denver he would stop with a Frenchman named Baptiste, and the two were great friends. One day the Scotchman disappeared on one of his sudden trips to the mountains, which he took so much pains to keep secret, and it was noticed that Baptiste had gone too. But they had not departed in company, and hence it was surmised that the Frenchman had followed McDonald with a view of spying upon the movements of the old man and ascertaining from what secret mine of the mountains he drew his wealth. The Scotchman never returned, and though eight years have since passed away none of his Denver friends ever learned what became of him.

The recent marked reports from North Park, taken in connection with the above facts, form stronger ground for the belief that McDonald passed through the Ute Pass, through the Middle Park and into the North Park, and years ago discovered the rich deposits the existence of which is only now beginning to be suspected.

By Universal Accord. AYER'S CATHARTIC PILLS are the best of all purgatives for family use. They are the product of long, laborious, and successful chemical investigation, and their extensive use, by Physicians in their practice, and by all civilized nations, proves them the best and most effective purgative Pills that medical science can devise. Being purely vegetable no harm can arise from their use. In intrinsic value and curative powers no other Pills can be compared with them, and every person, knowing their virtues, will employ them, when needed. They keep the system in perfect order, and maintain in healthy action the whole machinery of life. Mild, searching and effectual, they are especially adapted to the needs of the digestive apparatus, derangements of which they prevent and cure if timely taken. They are the best and safest physic to employ for children and weakened constitutions, where a mild, but effectual cathartic is required.
